Abstract use and problem thinking in late adolescence vary by sociodemographic characteristics. For example, the prevalence of abstract use is higher for boys than for girls, higher for White and Hispanic adolescents than for African American adolescents, and higher for those living in the north and south central United States than for those living in the South and West. Some of these relationships change with social adjustment. For example, although abstract use in high school tends to be higher in areas with lower population density (i.e., rural areas) than in more densely populated areas, this relationship reverses during early adulthood (Johnson et al., 2004, 2005). Lower economic status (i.e., lower educational level of parents) is associated with more abstract use during the early high school years, by the end of high school, and during the transition to adulthood, this relationship changes, and youth from higher economic status backgrounds consume greater amounts of abstract.
